Dr. Bluestone will present issues of concern to advocates and neutrals involved in interest arbitration and fact-finding during training sessions that move from basic wage determination theory through a good discussion of how changing economic reality should affect how arbitrators make decisions. Session I will lay out the standard economist's view of how pay rates should be set in theory relying on the theory of human capital and competitive labor markets. Essentially, this session will look at what is now known as the neo-classical model of wage determination. In Session II he will look at elaborations on the standard model bringing into account such institutional factors as labor market discrimination, labor market regulation, and trade unions in the setting of actual pay rates in the U.S. In Session III he will look at the evolution of pay rate determination in light of increased international trade, deindustrialization, the introduction of new technology, and the existence or lack thereof of international labor rights and standards. Finally, using everything that has been explored in the first three sessions, Session IV will devote itself to exploring how growing domestic competition, the introduction of new technology, and the growth of international competition must (or should) be taken into account by arbitrators in pay determination cases.
